AN EXPECTING ROMANCE OF TO-DAY.

The tremulous moonbeams loved with the restless leaves, and the whispering winds of the August night, like the sigh of some passing spirit, seemed the kind of sort of—like it was—something like that.

As he held her for one moment to his passionate embrace, holding her to his breast as though he would concentrate all the wild burning love of his life in that one caress, there was a sound like a hawser parting in a gale, and she gently stopped him.

"Darling," said she tenderly, "it is sweet to be loved, but consents are cash this summer, and there goes the third rod since Saturday."

"My own," he said, "how well I love you, your heart can tell. What have I not endured for your own dear sake? Twice last week your father kicked me off the moonlit stoop; on Tuesday last your brother licked me in the public street; the taste of my blood is yet fresh on the fangs of your sleeping hound, and should your mother find me here to-night—"

"But there is such a difference in our age, dear," she sighed, smoothing the rumpled ribbon at her waist; "the days of the years of your pilgrimage are forty and two, and I am but a little girl of nineteen brief but happy summers; and oh!"

"I think you," exclaimed the gray-haired boy, impetuously, "think you I am proud beyond my love, and would spurn you because the world may taunt you with your youth? Oh, no, in my arms I would shield you from its cruel sneers and for your sake I would forget how young you are. Besides, is not my ripe experience old enough for both of us?"

"And you are poor," she said, once more nestling in his arms; "you are poor, they say."

"Poor!" he exclaimed rapturously, and they who say it do not know how poor I am, sweetheart; by yon bright moon I swear I am poor enough for ten men. With me, you could not ask for more poverty and fewer clothes than I would bring you."

"And I am rich," she said, turning her face so that she could look into her lover's eyes. "He says that when he dies I will have $298,000."

But there was no shade of sadness, no passing shadow of renunciation in his steadfast eyes. Twining his arms around her yet more closely, he said more earnestly than had he spoken yet: "And am I base enough to give you up for that? Fairest and best, I do love well enough to overlook your wealth, and if you will but come to these arms of mine, bring it all with you—may, do not start; believe me, for my heart is in the words; bring it with you every whit, and see if to my constant heart it will not make you even doubly dear."

The sound of an old man was heard in the shadowy distance, and with one lingering embrace the proud youth died. And on her pillow that night, long hours the maiden brooded o'er his constancy and the exceeding faithfulness of his love, and murmuring "He loves me for myself and all I have, I am indeed his very own," she fell asleep to dream of him.

And how did she reward his constancy? Oh, faithfulness of woman's fickle vows! Oh, bleeding ruin of man's loving constancy! It has ever been so. Within three months that girl married a young fellow from Arizona, son of a bank president and himself a big operator in tin mines, worth about $500,000 in clear money and more mining claims than he could count in three weeks.

And the discarded lover, loving his false one no less dearly than before went out to Arizona and got a confidential clerkship under the husband, because he was an old friend of his wife's and he is now robbing his employer at a daily rate that shows how his heart still fondly clings to the love of other days.—Burlington Harbinger.
